Enock Powell, failing to secure a hall for Unitarian service, returns to his home in Topeka for the present, confident that the many liberal people of our city will soon wake up to the importance of a non-creed church, that emphasizes morals and helpfulness. Ideas are as important as corne iots, and the gospel of humanity a great need where men begin to realize that the true law of life is not shown by "the struggle for existence," but the struggle for moral excellence. At least that is about the way the reverend gentleman put it, who found real estate than religion, better satisfied with a deed to a corner lot in Wichita, and an even chance to dicker, than the promise of a whole pasture in paradise, all hedged about by trees of life, and beautifully diversified by streams whose laughing waters sparkle in the light of a never setting sun. These preachers, who make a study of the
